Rebirth Book PDFsLike many former football players who were determined to return to the game even after they retired, Boston College guard Ryan Anderson now seeks to do it as a minor league hockey player. The Boston College basketball player is headed to play with the Maine Mariners of the East Coast Hockey League for a couple of weeks before he heads off to the Professional Hockey League. Anderson, who will get the opportunity to help the Maine Mariners qualify for the playoffs for the first time, has an opportunity to play in a bigger venue than he did in college, but he hopes that doesn't affect his game. "I don't want it to," Anderson said. "I guess this is my proving ground to see how I'm going to do in the minor pro game. So I'm going to give it my all." Anderson will suit up for his first game with the Mariners Tuesday in Boston and on Wednesday will play with the Binghamton Senators, a team that beat the Florida Panthers in the NHL playoffs for the first time in history in 2011-12. Then the Boston College product will head to Maine. He will play on Friday and on Saturday will suit up against the Penguins in Pittsburgh. He won't get to play Tuesday or Saturday, but he won't feel any added pressure in his first assignment. He expects if he scores two goals against the Penguins, he will be handed a first line roster spot to continue the journey in the minor league for the remainder of the season. "That's what this is," said Anderson, who played in an exhibition game with the Penguins in November and scored a goal in that contest. "It's a learning experience. You learn what you need to work on and you learn what you need to improve." The exciting thing for Anderson, and a lot of guys in the same situation, is that even after they retire or are no longer playing, there are opportunities to get back into the game. Anderson, who has been a part of three NCAA Championships, has been on board with the idea of a professional career in hockey for some time. And he knows he will be compensated well for his off-season work, but he said he doesn't want any extra money. "
