It was easy to use and I was able to mix and mingle with other people's screens easily. I used GoMeeting as a salesman to sell software to me, customers. I had to have a face to show. I used to use webcam with Skype, but webcam was a little too open on the other end. I also used ScreenMeister but again, not as good as GoMeeting. I just had a bad experience with a $10,000 app called Chatwoot a couple years ago. If they were a "veteran" company with a track record, then I might be more forgiving. But the founder changed jobs over a year ago and left the company and the app. A: I have been using Microsoft Sharepoint for this purpose for a few years. Sharepoint is a hosted web application that allows for real-time communication (preferably with other people). It can be set up to allow real time desktop sharing and also WebEx type video conferencing with as many people as needed. Other things you can do are file share, web pages, and other applications. It is a web application, and you just have to log onto the site with the web browser on your client computer, and you have all the services (Sharepoint is a suite of applications, not just one). It is one of the most enterprise-ready applications I have ever used. Sharepoint is a very powerful tool for any type of business or team. There is a big caveat though. Microsoft Sharepoint does not have access to Skype. You need to purchase the SKYPE for Microsoft Office, or use an alternative such as google

I'm making a basic discord bot that sends a message to a user after a specific query is made. I know a solution but it involves using a lot of recursion, and I'm trying to avoid this if at all possible. So for example, I want the bot to wait for a user to type!helloworld into the server before it sends a message to them. I've come up with this, but it doesn't work. var client = require('discord.js').client; var nickname = 'Me'; var chatId = client.guilds.get(914764773544000499).id; client.on('ready', function() { client.channels.get(chatId).join(); }); client.on('message', (msg) => { if (msg.content.startsWith('!helloworld')) { console.log('before'); client.channels.get(chatId).sendMessage(msg.author.displayName + 'has just sent me a message!'); console.log('after'); } }); A: In Node
