I thought Lightroom 5 might mercifully provide any upgrade over Lightroom 4 , but Lightroom 5 instead delivered more of the same. Its new features mostly put the focus on image-processing, and the compromises made to add that are mostly annoying.

Quite like the previous version, Lightroom 5 offers two ways of managing your library of images. You can use the existing "Import and Organize" module to import your image files and organize them as albums into separate folders, with the express purpose of being able to manage them in the future. The 'Catalog' mode provides an all-in-one environment for an overview of your image files, like a smart phone, and file management, without taking your time to organize them. You can also apply Adobe's Collection feature that can organize files based on similar content and date.

Of course, Lightroom has many new features to offer in several major areas. Besides the basic image-editing operations, it is not very good at digital image types, such as RAW and HDR. Editing stills is great if you do it the right way, but for the rest, I hope the next version will be better. For example, the exposure, contrast, and level tools are always used when making RAW images, but Lightroom's adjustments include doing things that you shouldn't, like alter the white balance and use the temperature slider. All the updates to keywords and other features are useful, but the ones that make Lightroom 5 stand out are especially those that increase its storage and search capabilities.
